We have already unoted a portion of Mark Twain's speech in reply to Matthew Atnoid's criticism of the "grammar" in Across the bedges, thick with autumn flowers, Grant's "Memoirs." We now give an adlitional quotation:

People may hunt on what microscopic notes they please, but, after all, the fact emains and cannot be dishelped, that Gen. remains and cannot be disnegged, that ten-ferant's book is a great (and in its peculiar department) unique and unapproachable literary masterpiece. In their line there is no higher literature than those modest, simple "memods." Their style is at least flawless, and no man can improve upon it;
